ABSTRACT In this study, pathogenicity and root colonization were investigated in peach (Prunus persica (L.) Batsch) and apple (Malus domestica (Borkh.) Heim). Inoculated peaches and apples with 0.3 g of naturally infected roots per plant were artificially inoculated with 1 mL of fungal culture in the greenhouse or on the orchard. In the greenhouse, root rot incidence and severity were 0, 14, 14, and 43% in peaches and 0, 33, 33, and 50% in apples, respectively. In the orchard, root rot incidence and severity were 3, 3, 8, and 5% in peaches and 6, 8, 9, and 15% in apples, respectively. Fungal mycelia were not detected in any tissues of inoculated peaches and apples by histological examination. In the greenhouse and in the orchard, mycelia were frequently observed on the lateral roots and slightly on the main roots of inoculated peaches and apples. Hyphae of Eutypa lata (Berk. & M.A. Curtis) Berkenbaas were observed in the root tissue. This study indicates that Eutypa lata is pathogenic to peach and apple, but its growth is limited by host roots.Spend a little time on the streets of Silver Spring and you'll see a mix of academic disciplines: dental hygiene, real estate, interior design. But an unexpected realm of study, one that could help a community develop into a hub of tech and start-up entrepreneurship, is flying under the radar. "There are people who study community architecture," says Tom Davies, the founder of the not-for-profit Silver Spring Partnership for Community Development. "Our work is geared more toward walkability and density." Davies hopes to help redevelop the northern section of Silver Spring, known as Northgate, which has seen an explosion of new residential development over the past few years. Northgate has some decidedly unfinished buildings, such 2d92ce491b
