Lewis is Highlight of Litcon: The special issue of Literary Review in memory of Hugo is now online Posted May 3, 2014 By Zimmey, Contributor "C.S. Lewis was a dear friend of Victor Hugo, and one of his most trusted companions," explains John Galsworthy. "Victor Hugo says of him in his autobiography, Les Misérables: 'This child of literature, this exquisite-witted youth, with his first works already known and celebrated, had, however, in the natural overflow of a deep heart and a high mind, even then, something of the major's character, an eager and constant desire for things greater than he had yet seen.'" In his recent New York Times obituary for Hugo, A. N. Wilson cited Lewis's The Screwtape Letters as a main reason why Hugo was such an important literary influence. The November issue of the Literary Review commemorates Hugo's centennial. Editor John Galsworthy has chosen to highlight Lewis's remarkable correspondence with Hugo. Lewis first met Hugo, then a boy, in 1887 at the home of Marie Louise Bertin, daughter of the editor of La Revue. They exchanged letters for the rest of their lives. Lewis also knew Hugo's son, the novelist Balthazar, and became an ardent fan of Balthazar's writings, especially A King in Exile and his magnum opus, The Years of Hope. Lewis will be the focus of a special issue of the Literary Review in November. It is sponsored by Ransom Center Libraries and the Lewis and Clark College International Center for the Study of Intellectual Freedom. Lewis scholars have been excited for months over the publication of what might be the last known letters between Hugo and Lewis. In a letter to George Sarton in early November, 1963, Lewis outlined a short description of a letter from Hugo to him. As Lewis reports in The Letters of C.S. Lewis to G. Sarton (Fordham University Press), Hugo wrote, "You ask me a great question. Is there an immortality?... Yes, but not yet. We are waiting for the
