The LGBT community in Iran is a very small one, and a recent survey has found that it faces many difficulties in accessing HIV-related services. An anonymous interview survey conducted by researchers at the Institute for Health Policy Research at the Tehran University of Medical Sciences and Health Services and published in the International Journal of Environmental Research and Public Health found that HIV prevalence among gay men in the capital is 2%, with 15% of those surveyed admitting to having sex with men. According to the survey, HIV prevalence among the LGBT community is five times higher than that among the general population. Religion, poverty and a lack of education among the LGBT community are identified as key barriers to the provision of HIV services, as well as homosexuality itself. Poverty was identified by the researchers as a key factor affecting access to HIV treatment, with one respondent stating, “We didn’t get treatment because we were poor”. The survey reveals that the attitudes of health care providers towards the LGBT community were limited due to “not being aware of the subject, their limited knowledge and specific problems they face,” said the report. It was also noted that “health workers are afraid of getting involved in personal matters, they do not understand the problem and are not trained to deal with it.” The study also found that 64% of LGBT people in the capital reported being out to their family, while 26% reported that they were out to their friends. As in other countries around the world, the small Iranian LGBT population is a key target of Iran’s government, which has cracked down on its activities, including violence against women and men in same-sex relationships. The survey respondents said that the most common form of physical violence was verbal abuse, which was a common theme of other surveys carried out on Iranian LGBT people. One respondent said: “...people can even verbally
