In such scanning, original documents are scanned and the resulting image is digitally processed to obtain a file or so-called “document”. A great number of document processing systems have been developed which can create and/or output electronic files, and most of them utilize one or more scanning devices to scan documents. However, conventional scanning devices scan the document from only one side of the document, and therefore, to scan both sides of a document, the scanning device must be moved from side-to-side of the document in order to scan both sides of the document. Scanning devices, in many instances, are coupled to a processor and the processor is configured to generate electronic files from the document. Many document processing systems utilize the scanning device, processor and other components to form a network of devices. Such systems can be utilized in a retail environment to create files of customer receipts. In such instances, the devices within the network may be included on the same physical computing platform, but the network can be utilized to transmit data to each other. In this regard, the networked devices can be coupled to one or more peripheral devices that can be used to input or output data to a particular device. In such a manner, it is possible to combine a personal computer with a scanning device, a printer and the like in a single system and utilize the scanned data and the computer to generate and output an electronic receipt.

This technique can be used in retail, restaurant, hotel, manufacturing,
