One of the more interesting developments in higher education over the past couple of decades is the growth of "Experiential Learning." This approach, developed primarily in the United States (although now spreading more broadly) challenges the very nature of education, by seeking to redefine what it means to be educated. We here at ARDU often get asked what "great" teachers we have. Most often these teachers happen to be those who are by their very nature, "experiential" (think Marcus Evans, for example). I was in fact asked on a radio program yesterday to name three of our best teachers. I nearly got tongue tied, because as a matter of fact I can't. The best teachers of the children that we have here at ARDU are those who have been part of our experience. But they might not be the best teachers I have encountered in a classroom setting. The essence of education is growth, transformation. Some people may want to deny that they want transformation, but they may be attracted to an educational institution because they feel they will not grow. I am fairly confident that those children whom we have had in our classes are those whose growth and transformation we have attempted to facilitate. Yes, we have had very good teachers who have had significant influence on us (like Marcus Evans, or my own teacher Catherine Loewen). But I think the best teachers I have met haven't always been teachers. The issue of 1cb139a0ed
